America’s long history of violence began with the killing and displacement of its indigenous peoples. Later, largely as a result of slavery, the Civil War nearly tore the country apart. The U.S. is a world leader in gun ownership per capita, in murders committed by guns and in numbers of citizens incarcerated. Domestic violence, sexual harassment, and sex trafficking continue to be serious, yet often ignored problems, and places we expect to be safe - homes, schools, theaters, hospitals - have sometimes experienced bloodshed and murder. Violence in video games, television, and film has become more graphic and explicit, and extreme aggression in professional sports now results in brain and other life-shortening injuries. Join a discussion about potential factors implicated in violence including: changes in popular culture; a public/private prison industry focused more on profit than rehabilitation; pervasive attitudes regarding mental health; and the systemic roles of sexism and racism. In addition to understanding causal links, learn more about potential solutions. How can we create a society focused on conflict resolution through pragmatic, peaceful means?

Panelists: Dallas Drake, Executive Director, Center for Homicide Research; Lindsey Middlecamp, Assistant City Attorney for the City of Minneapolis, rape and sexual assault survivor and activist; Zeam L.B. Porter, a transgender/gender non-conforming high school student and activist in anti-bullying/Safe Schools initiatives; Oliver Williams, Professor, University of Minnesota School of Social Work whose research focuses on domestic violence.

Moderator: Julie Showers, Director, University of Minnesota, Office for Conflict Resolution.
